

9/11 – Ten Years Later – My Reflections

Description

That day I was retired from the Navy, way in the rear, without any gear of helpfulness to those on the front lines. So, where I was, suffice it to say, I remember, but it wasn't off significance to the big picture.

That day/event shattered a major belief structure I had held since the summer of 1988: Major, large scale wars have no place in the post Cold War World. I think about it: The issues are no longer taking over crop land, but the economic might of the competing nations. To go for the scorched earth, have an artillery division take 3 feet of dirt off a square mile does nothing to preserve the economic resources you're coveting.

After 9 months at War College, reading much more history, to add to the many tomes already ingested, I was thinking we'd be more in the "staring each other down" mode in the future. Prepared to fight, but not doing it in a big way. Bad outcomes on both sides, but then, I didn't give guerilla forces much of a place in my thinking.

Then came September 11th, and the face of war in the modern era (meaning when I'm living), took a radical turn: A religiously based, ideologically driven, small group of people, not aligned with any one nation, and certainly not organized to meet the definition of the armed force of a sovereign nation, without the direct or monetary support from an established nation-state, arrived on the scene, outdoing even the Japanese Naval Forces of 12/7/41, and then stood up to take a bow. Thus Al-Queda became part of the lexicon.

The "Laws of War" were not written to primarily handle this type of conflict. They were designed to manage the conflict between nation states, with easily identified military forces, loyal to one flag or another. Guerillas were but a side show. Certainly not without impact, but still a side show, until 9/11/01 arrived.

There went my construct on how conflict would happen in the now definitely post-BiPolar Super Power era.

Other things changed. How those combatants, illegal as they were, were to be handled. We got Guantanamo Bay, a place I had frequented as a training base during my time in uniform, converted into a holding facility for those we captured on the battle field. Why? By all I can reckon we didn't want to go there and handle the illegal combatants (those who were armed and attacking US troops, yet without an identified national uniform or affiliation), and summarily execute them where they were captured. It's allowed, but, by being compassionate (I'm all in on this one), we then ended up with a situation on our hands as how to ensure justice was done. You know the history of that discussion, which still isn't completed (despite a pledge to handle this from the current Commander-in-Chief).

We now, as an entire society, began looking over our shoulders, and eyeing suspicious acts of any one around us. Top it off with pre-suspecting every single air passenger as a real possibility of being a hijacker not wanting cash, like D.B. Cooper. On top of the untold billions invested in equipment to clearly show we trusted no one citizen of our nation, the tremendous loss of productivity we have suffered, which I suspect will never be calculated, but it is clearly a cost we have incurred by having to arrive earlier, sit longer, just to make sure it doesn't happen again.

Along the way, we developed an extreme phobia of telling someone else something that might hurt their feelings, such as "if you're willing to consider killing us for your ideology, we're willing to try to kill you first to prevent it."

The phobia then extended to ensure we didn't inflame those who, by their deeds, had already shown they were upset by us.

And, along the way, it has become acceptable to determine something that happened in the name of Christianity in the 2nd millenia AD, was a workable rationale to give a pass to those who began mass killings in the name of Allah, like the modern world, was still in the Middle East doing something other than run of the mill economic trade and business.

On top of that, while trying to shut out Christianity as the root cause of the attacker's anger, therefore justified (in some circles), we have been told to even think someone who subscribes to a faith that clearly has scriptures detailing the destruction of the "infidels," is Islamophobic and is a crime of hate.

Excuse me, but slaughtering just anyone in their way, Christians, Hindus, Buddhists, atheists and Muslims alike is a hate crime to me, but I'm being "intolerant" of saying killing for killings sake is a hateful thing.

Enough of that, so onto a set of rhetorical issues befuddle me:

I'm really missing the point of those who say we "over reacted" or, as one man put it a about a month ago, "we went to war for no reason." Getting on board with those, like President Clinton, and the early version of President Obama (and I disagree with this, but it helps address the people who think war was not the answer): I'd like to ask them how they have reacted when they are told that a serial murderer is on the loose in their area. I know, as we see this all the time, from both sides of the aisle politically, they demand the law enforcement not rest until the person responsible is found and brought to justice. They want dragnets and sweeps and police to protect them from the threat of being next, and have no problem "judging" the murderer without a trial. So my question would be: What if 2996 people were murdered and that person announced that they had done it and they would do it again, and again, until they had their way with all of you? I think I know the reaction, but the craziness here is they somehow think the 2996 lives lost on 9/11 was no call to action to find those who did it and remove the capability for it to happen anymore, particularly in of the continued statements of future attacks, let alone having seen the actual carnage all over the world, in Europe, India, the Middle East, Malasia, and more places. What kind of a society would we be, saying we are a nation of laws, who turned our backs on that tragedy of 9/11 and said "we can't respond, we had it coming to us." ?

Anyhow, much has changed. Politicians are fearful of making waves, because we can't hurt feelings. Small organizations get people to believe they have a big voice, then proceed to peddle disinformation, and we are told they are the experts and do not question them (side note: We somehow hate corporate lobbyists doing the same thing, but once again, when it's from an outside force, we must now bow and scrape in their general direction, so they don't do it again—but wait: They tell us they will and then we still cower).

On top of that, it has become fashionable to ask the person on the street their opinion, on complex matters, and honor their answers. We're not getting any smarter, as seen by standardized testing, and revisionist history, yet somehow we have to hear from those who lack even a modicum of understanding, as if they are all expert scholars on the subject.

And my last item before stopping rambling: I heard it this morning. On the about to be dedicated "Peace Pole," the message of "peace on earth" was done in four languages, and particularly in English, as "we need to hear it the most." I may have missed it, but Arabic native speakers attacked us on 9/11, and have done so for many more years, thankfully overseas, and "we" need to hear it most implies very strongly we were the cause. And, by the way, the other three languages didn't include Arabic. At the services, the same leader read a letter from a very close friend who has very recently served in Afghanistan about his year's tour. The Army Captain was obviously in Civil Affairs, as he was in charge of getting wells put in for the people. In his letter he mentioned, how during his tour, he was amazed at the massive outpouring of help from people all over the US, mostly strangers to him, to all him to deliver school supplies and so much more to the children of Afghanistan. The majority of the letter reiterated how he couldn't fully comprehend this help sent to a far away US population to people they didn't even know, just because it was a gift. and "we" who speak English need to hear about "peace on earth" more.

When was the last time the Taliban send school supplies to the mid-West after the tornados, or the mid-Atlantic and North Eastern States in the wake of the hurricane?

So, yes, things have changed. And some people have still not bothered to fully understand we didn't attack because we "over reacted," we did it because 2996 people are no longer there to continue conducting "peace on Earth" operations, as they were doing that morning, ten years ago.

Category

1. 2996 Tribute
2. Geo-Political
3. History
4. International Relations
5. Leadership
6. Military
7. Military History
8. Political
9. Stream of Consciousness

Tags

1. 9/11

2. 9/11 reflections
3. peace on earth
4. terrorist attacks
5. terrorism
6. terrorists

Date Created

September 11, 2011

Author

admin

default watermark