Another letter with no agenda

Description

Through following links to places such as this, I have found some wonderfully detailed first person letters and emails. They arenâ€™t written in order to further anyone, they are just a slice of life, written by those who are on the front lines, in peaceful and not so peaceful places.

The link here says at least two things: The writer is a person who can stop, put aside his inital reaction and focus on what it really happening. Secondly, it is a reminder that the world see us through the filter of such men and women who wear a uniform and come to their aid, and also, let us not forget to deal in that issue of justice.

What does this mean to us?

default watermark

â€“ We owe it to ourselves to send the very best, and make sure they are supported. Their actions leave a lasting impression on those who see them.

â€“ We owe it to the world to send the military abroad for the right reasons. Some will consider they are now in Iraq for some wrapped idea we have become neo-colonialist, but the truth is our daily, long term security is intimately linked with the ability of others to live, knowing a basic respect for their humanity. In a conversation last night, someone told me President Bush remarked that after WWII, the thought of making a democracy of Japan was completely written off. Look at the result of sticking to a dream to make a peaceful nation, then come back and tell me us being in Iraq now is a bad thnig.

Also, consider this: Permission to use nuclear weapons has been given to Osama bin Laden. for those who would like to sit, safe in their home, believing itâ€™s all about Haliburton filling the pockets of Dick Cheny, HELLO, McFly! Youâ€™re in a new world now. You can choose to pretend it wonâ€™t happen, or you can figure out how you can best secure the lives of many, now and in the future.

Category

1. Uncategorized

Date Created
November 13, 2004
Author