I Sense a Pattern Hereâ€¦

Description

I donâ€™t get it. A national level politician makes a statement in clear English, and, those he spoke off take offense.

The media and the staffers, now, being smarter than us troglodyte type people who can only work at McDonalds or get stuck in Iraq, have to tell us what he really said. Could it be the liberalized education system, more enthralled with telling children to feel, rather than know things (like the English language), has failed us and made us too stupid? I guess we didnâ€™t study hard enough to know what he said wasnâ€™t what he saidâ€¦our bust, sorryâ€¦.

But, the pattern I see is a national leader makes a statement in public and, when pinned down by the fire from those offended, he sneaks off to offer an apology in a completely inappropriate forum.

Senator Durbin is the first one Iâ€™m talking about. Now, Senator Kerry, makes a public statement and follows it up with more public statements telling us to just swallow the joke he bungled (jokes he loves so well), but, now posts a statement on his web site saying he apologizes for his offense â€œto anyone he offendedâ€• (Yeah, not like I think I did, but if it offended you, then Iâ€™m sorry).

Let me see: Durbin doesnâ€™t go to GTMO and face those he called Nazis, but goes to a local (read: Friendly) veterans group in his district, and says heâ€™s sorry to WWII vets. Kerry says lots in public and defends himself in public, but places a post on a website that says something differenet from what he personally is heard saying.

Yep, donâ€™t blame President Bush, Senator Kerry, blame the poor job of liberals in completely brainwashing entire generations so weâ€™d know you didnâ€™t mean what you said.
